Kathakali is one of the oldest theatre forms in the world. Infact, there many important Kathakali dance centers in Kochi, which not only render training in this art form, but also organize regular dance recitals. The Kathakali dance is presented in a group, the themes of which are based on Hindu Mythologies - particularly on epics - Ramayana and Mahabharata.

An interesting feature of Kathakali is that the make-up of the dancers is very elaborate. The dancers have to undergo a rigorous training as Kathakali involves a highly developed language of gesture through which they have to convey the story. Kathakali is well embedded in the art and culture of Kochi. To increase its popularity even more, a brief write up in English and Malayalam is distributed to the audience who come at the Kathakali dance centers of Kochi to watch performances.

Partially destroyed by the Portuguese, the synagogue was rebuilt by the Dutch in 1664. A beautiful clock tower was added in the mid 18th century and the floors paved with fine hand-painted willow-pattern tiles. The culture and lifestyle of the backwaters is as unique as the ecology. Habitation is everywhere, but in such harmony that it seems inseparable from nature. Wood and slapdash plaster huts are scattered on both sides, with an ever-present complement of pigs, chickens and buffaloes.

Rice fields stretch like improbably large lawns, laid out amidst clusters thick with coconut, cashew, guava and mango. Fishing boats with home-made patchwork sails ply the canals. A little hut turns out to be a coir factory, with women spinning and knotting busily. A man stands still as a yogi, neck-deep in the canal, waiting to catch a prize fish with his bare hands.

Later lounge at the sun deck sipping hot coffee or simply relax with a book. The boat will anchor by sundown in preparation for the evening dinner again freshly cooked by your expert chef. Retire for the night rocked by the gentle waves.
